

After spending the last few weeks on bike commuting I've now completed a month-long bike commute from Kings Cross station to work. I made the journey via 3 different Metro lines and all services along the way. The routes I took varied in length and design from linear to more circular. I chose the most indirect routes possible when looking for transit options and yet managed to get a good view of the road network I was travelling through and a good overview of the location I was working in. Starting from the Western entrance to Kings Cross station you can access five Metro lines that all end at Kings Cross or Bank. The first stop on a commute is most commonly a train, however I arrived at the first stop by bus as there were no trains available. In this case I opted for the 150 bus which came every 10-15 minutes when I took it to the Gold Line station, and dropped me off in the suburb of Maybury. Here the Gold Line merges with the Green and Red lines to make a circular trip around the suburbs of south-west Melbourne. At Maybury I was dropped off at the Hospital Hill stop, where from now I use the Green and Red line. The green line runs from Southern Cross station to Craigieburn and is the most direct of the three options I took, however the red line leaves from Southern Cross and heads in the other direction. Initially I took the Green line, heading north. The Green line takes you along the length of the suburb of Frankston where the sole businesses are local public houses. Once in Frankston the line splits at North Brighton station, with the westbound line taking you further north into the city centre and the eastbound line continuing towards Brighton station. The red line took the same route as far as Sunshine station, which is where it also splits. Here there are no buses, so I took the green line back to Frankston station and transferred to the red line. Once you arrive at the Farran Springs stop, you will be approaching Sunbury station, but you will have gone a long way off route. Following the rail tracks that stretch from Willaura to East Brighton and Old Brighton and crossing them twice, this is where I take the Circular Sea train line. The train is only a 5-7 minute trip and accesses a route that is not yet complete. The line passes through a number of suburbs such as Greenvale, Monash and East Brighton, before eventually reaching East Brighton station where it splits into two

Furious rioters took to the streets of the French capital to protest against the election victory of Emmanuel Macron, who was elected to the presidential office in a victory that sparked anti-government protests. The demonstrators surrounded the Champs-Elysees and then attacked riot police as they tried to police the area. Mayor of Paris Anne Hidalgo called on Parisians to support the two-man police force deployed in the capital after the biggest demonstrations in modern French history. More than 2,500 police officers were sent in to maintain public order, and another 400 were deployed to reinforce the security forces. Demonstrators chanted, "Macron resign". "They don't fear the truth and they have no shame," said Adrien Chamoiseau, a 65-year-old doctor who said he stood in the Champs Elysees during the protests. "It's horrible to see the demonstrations turn so violent."
