Under natural conditions, the abundance of C. obsoletus and C. scoticus does not significantly change with elevation. This result might seem surprising, because temperature decreases with increasing elevation (Fig. 2{ref-type="fig"}B). However, at the European level, elevation seems to be a more important factor than temperature in structuring C. obsoletus and C. scoticus populations. Indeed, altitude exhibits a higher explanatory power than temperature, and it is the most influential variable in the top model. A similar result has been found for C. dubitans in North America, where altitude was a better predictor than mean annual temperature and precipitation (Larkin et al., 2014{ref-type="ref"}). Altitude has a significant effect on the abundance of C. obsoletus, and its positive effect is similar to temperature: At low altitudes, larval populations are mainly composed e79caf774b
