The article focuses on the problem of diagnosis of pseudo-acquired diseases, particularly those whose clinical presentation makes it difficult to determine the cause of the disease and those which are associated with a specific therapy. Case histories of three patients with pseudo-acquired diseases are reported. In the first case, the clinical picture of the disease was determined to be a vasculitis, whereas the second case represented a condition with a clinical appearance resembling that of an acute bacterial meningitis. In both cases the diseases were not acquired, but the patients had previously received therapeutic doses of penicillins. In the third case, the diagnosis was based on clinical features, biochemistry, and immunology. As a result, a likely diagnosis was possible and penicillin was discontinued. The possibility of the presence of pseudo-acquired diseases is discussed. In particular, the key factors underlying the
