“This is the first time in the history of football where players can actually feel the game,” said Andrew “BozBaggs” Huddleston, Creative Director at EA SPORTS. “We’ve seen players in motion on the pitch in FIFA before, but those videos are still quite rare. All of the players and all of the actions that the players make are captured in real-time in our studio in Dundee, Scotland. This is something that is truly happening.” Andrew “BozBaggs” Huddleston, Creative Director at EA SPORTS Players can choose to play a full match in motion capture mode, or go into a quick match and only go into real-time with the Player Experience. “The first thing we thought about when we started this was: can we make it feel more authentic?” said Huddleston. “What we’ve found is when you play a game in real-time with motion, it is a sensory experience, a visceral experience, and you see the realism. You see how the game seems to flow, how the players seem to behave. When we moved players into the game, everyone at the studio started talking about it. Everyone had to see this.” In addition to the technology itself, EA SPORTS is also making further improvements to the physics, ball control and player movements. More than 90 new animations have been added to the game, including new jumping animations, ball control (flicks, backheels, lobs, toe punts and ball rolls), new high-intensity animations for shots, passes, dribbles and tackles, and more. FIFA 22 introduces a new keyword “runback” to show the player to run back as soon as they receive a ball at the end of a tackle. “We already had most of this in the game before,” said Huddleston. “We have players run back to play a pass – you can see that in some sequences – but we’ve really put them into the game. If a player gets fouled, they’ll run back. If a player is coming to the ball they will run back to get to the ball faster, or if a player is reaching the ball they’ll run back. If a player is moving towards the ball, the ball will stay on the ground.
