An operation designed to reduce the size of the German Kharkov operational-strategic reserves. The goal of the offensive was to reduce the size of German Kharkov reserves. In turn, the main blow was directed against Kharkov. On the left flank the divisions of the 3rd Romanian Corps and the 43rd Romanian Infantry Corps would attack in the Kharkov salient (Berezina mountains) to the east of the city. South of Kharkov was the 51st Romanian Corps, which would attack in the Shklo area and possibly reach the area of Kharkov from the north. The 5th Romanian Corps had its main attack in the Krasnobavarsky district of Kharkov, cutting off the breakout routes from the city, as well as the bridgehead of the 52nd Romanian Corps along the Uda from Sokol region to Shpakovka. The regrouped troops of this area would have to reach the city, thus reinforcing the main blow. Any German units left behind would be destroyed by tanks and the artillery of the corps. The main blow would be directed towards the south from the southwest, and towards the east from the southeast. The exact route is to be chosen as there were a number of possible routes, as well as several small roads, which would make the task of tank units difficult. The course of the main blow was chosen based on the data obtained in the reconnoiter. The plan for the offensive (August 22, 1943) was a repeated offensive action conducted by 10 divisions (4 infantry divisions and 6 gds). The plan was based on a concentric movement, where the divisions from the east and the south would first cross the Soviet rear, then attack the enemy forward of the main forces. The attack was to be directed at the enemy in his positions in the general area of Kharkov. In addition to the main blow, the detachments of some units would also attack, primarily to destroy the enemy forward detachments, such as the enemy during the approach to the city, destroy bridges and railroad crossing over the Berezina River. The operation was designed to eliminate the entire enemy group (regardless of the final destination). Player Experience: Performing the plan of the operation and winning it will be extremely difficult for the player, because the German forces in the operation area are very dispersed. They are divided between units of various units, the majority of which are dispersed behind the defense of the main force of the Axis. c9d1549cdd

: The Case for a Goaltimate for a Failed Star Trek Sequel By Chris Mackenzie Recently, with "Survivor" returning to our TV sets, I looked back to a popular canceled show from over 20 years ago. It was a show I had gone to too many times to count. (I was seven when the show was a hit and as an eleven year old.) It was one of the first TV shows I watched in the winter months so it was fun to see it return to the screen. I had often wondered if the show's showrunners had planned its return and I was pleased when they admitted that they had … For those unfamiliar with Survivor, the basic premise of the series was that several uninjured people from various points in space or history were sent to an isolated island. The only way to leave the island was to compete against your fellow residents in various physical challenges in order to survive and if you made it to the end, you would be the one to leave the island. The show was a ratings success for CBS (at its height it was the most watched show in the US) and concluded twenty years ago. As I sat and watched my old friend re-enter the society of modern media, it was suddenly brought home to me that the show was over. Gone. Too far gone to produce a new generation of fans and therefore too expensive to produce. It was time to let this great half century old idea run its course and instead spend some of that extraordinary budget on something new and different. Here was a long promised Star Trek, come at just the right time. But – it had been ordered and before much of the base could realize it – was cancelled. Many have asked what happened. What changed to lead to the collapse of the Star Trek franchise. The line up of films was released and, many argued, did very well. The Star Trek universes on the small screen had exploded into the mainstream, the Paramount brand was starting to really take hold; Deep Space 9, Voyager and Enterprise were all successful. The museum and the remaining vessel were given a new lease of life in the theaters. It seemed the end was in sight. I have looked myself for an explanation and have come up with a few, none of them satisfactory. The middling success of the Abrams' reboot movies seemed to make some sort of subtle but damaging impression. The time travel bits seemed to jar people, they were simply not to be trusted. Mr. Decker seemed much
