My aim is to generate discussion, and to uncover truth. I do this because I believe is inherent to living an authentic life. In our increasingly opinion-based society we are often left wondering whether we are fact or fiction, truth or opinion. I hope my writing will help shine a light on what I think and what I believe.Q: Kotlin: Basic Unit Testing Help (Part 3) So, I learned a new thing! Now, I'm trying to use that knowledge for more testing (I started on unit testing, too, but I'm a beginner, and I don't know what's wrong with the code - it doesn't compile or run or anything). Basically, I'm testing a basic class which has a single function, and I want to verify that the function is passing inputs to the correct class fields (but with different values to test). Is this the right way to use it? @Test fun testApprove() { val customer = mock(Customer::class.java) val resp = mock(SERVICE_RESPONSE) every { service.approve(1, 1, customer, 1, resp) } returns true runBlocking { service.approve(1, 1, customer, 1, resp) }.await() verify(customer).setCustomerId(eq(1)) verify(customer).setCustomersAmount(eq(1)) verify(customer).setRequestId(eq(1)) } A: You should check your test results. Verify is the last part of the method and you can use it outside. But
