It's a fun little game. You have to click the right time and space and then watch the shapes drop down. A: My guess is that you didn't save the game in XML but instead saved it as a simple text file. If you did that, you're in luck. You just need to find the savegame.json file in your game folder. The path to that file on my computer is: Steam\steamapps\common\YourGameName\GameContent\Misc\SaveGame\YourSaveName.json Now to open it, either launch the game again in debug mode, or just Ctrl+N+D on Windows or Cmd+N+D on Mac. At the top you should see a new information panel saying "Open ". If you press that, it will open the file you just saved. Q: How do I create a custom behavior in FileSystemWatcher? This question on SO essentially covers what I'm after. What I'm trying to do is create a FileSystemWatcher object, and whenever it receives notification of a file change, run some code that will update the contents of another file. This is somewhat similar to answers on SO posted by x5n9l3w (see answer #3 in the link below), however I'm looking to add in some logic to my listener method. My problem with that answer is that the answer (in the link above), basically just runs code while it waits. How do I know when the code has been executed? I haven't tried using the FileSystemWatcher's internalOnChanged event yet. If I do, does it actually mean that the file is changing at the OS level, even when I'm doing some work on the changed file? If it does, I guess my other option is to use a Windows Service, but I'd prefer to avoid that. A: The docs say that if you configure the FileSystemWatcher with the InternalChangeType field set to EventFileShare and FileShareAccessNone, then the event will be fired asynchronously, i.e. once the changes have been committed to disk and are available for reading in your program (or are being written if you're interested in async events

. Chris went to the bathroom, which was on the ground floor, while I climbed the stairs in search of the old and beautiful bathroom and even more beautifully, the bedroom of Annabel's 'grannie'. In the ground floor I found the living room, which was pretty, full of old tat and a floor mirror the size of a ship's wheel. In the dining room was a very old table and a very old chair. On the top floor, it was the same. In the bathroom I found a small electric fire, a little sink and a bath, and a toilet. 'Right,' I said, 'I've seen all I need to see.' 'You're not staying in here?' I took another look around – it looked cleaner than I'd expected – and stepped out. She gestured towards the stairs and asked, 'Who else is going to help you?' 'Some of the police will be,' I said. 'But some of them are still at the pub. And we'll have to walk past them.' 'And do you know how we do that?' 'Not really. I've never made a living on my feet.' 'I mean,' she said, 'do we bring them down from the room, knock them on the head, knock them out, or...?' 'They probably don't want to do that,' I replied. She stepped back from me, eyes widening, and fluttered her hands like those little birds you sometimes see in cages in nature programmes when they're talking about birth and death and life and all those things. 'Well,' she said, 'it's all a dreadful business.' 'So next time,' I said, 'we'd better go and speak to the police upstairs.' 'There's no one up there,' she said. Inspector Fox, who stood barring the entrance to the manager's office, looked back to where I stood – perhaps five yards behind him – and spied me. He stepped back himself. 'Nice of you to come,' he said. 'We're not. I mean, we didn't want to call you, but...' He glanced at Annabel. 'And she insisted.' 'Sorry to hear about your parents,' I said. 'One of mine died young, the other not long ago.' 'It's
