I have the following PostgreSQL 9.2 function that looks like this: create or replace function f1(i integer, c varchar) returns integer language plpgsql as $$ begin return 0; except when then full 0; end; $$ For simplicity, I am going to use a single table. The problem I am having is that whenever this function is called by PostgreSQL, the output is only 0 and 0.92 (the should be 27 rows). I know this because I would get 27 rows if this function were just returning 0, not returning 0 and returning no rows. What am I missing? A: Rather than using a foreign key, try a trigger instead: CREATE TRIGGER tg_my_table_after_insert_trg AFTER INSERT ON my_table FOR EACH ROW EXECUTE PROCEDURE f1(NEW.id, NEW.c); It is less error-prone (for instance, it may catch errors that your current trigger fails to) and can perform far better than a foreign key. The function would look as expected. Q: Why would people wear white suits in this anime? Does anybody know why people wear white suits in this anime? A: Well, as I said before: They often wear white suits to show their devotion to the White Lady in the manga. They like to wear white suits for this one reason. White suits are in common use (just like black suits). It might just be a little trend. Japanese companies often use white suits in commercial advertising. When they visit a big company they want to show what they are really
