On July 6, 2018, the New York Times began pushing itself to break through the wall of obscurity for the private sector. In short, the Times' strategy is to shine a bright light on those entities that are not going to bat an eye at selling data to the government. Part of the Times' problem is that it has become a victim of its own success. People don't want to buy the Times for the lead reporting anymore. They want the paper to trade away their privacy for clicks. Here are four simple things the Times could do to rebuild its public trust. 1) On privacy, front-and-center. In just a few decades, the Times has transformed itself from a newspaper that was actually sold to a broad reader base to a newspaper that is increasingly read by the very people who are supposed to keep its officials in check. In exchange for its impactful investigative reporting, the Times was able to raise the profile of its brand. What that has meant in terms of money is that readers are willing to sacrifice some of their privacy in exchange for hard-hitting, high-impact stories. This all makes sense, but has the Times figured out how to put its readers first? At least one of the prominent pundits in charge of the Times knows that talking directly to the reader is one of the most important things they can do: “The Times is about as good as a source of government accountability as you’re going
