As shown above, a double-sided display with a single device has a disadvantage of complicated and large size, because the display device is required to have a double surface. The double-sided display increases a width in a direction where the display is turned and become disadvantageous for reduction of the size of a device having the display. To solve this problem, the double-sided display requires two independent drivers and two respective display devices and, thus, problems such as high cost and complicate wiring of signal lines arise.

Q: How to use git to sync folders I want to use git to keep a simple repository of a folder with files. Right now I'm doing something like the following, and it's not working. What I want to do is keep a copy of the files on the server.

$git init $git add -A $git commit -m "1" $cd the_folder $cp . $cd.. $cd.. $git status $cp./the_folder/. The problem is that cp will try to copy files without checking whether they have been changed in the working directory. Also, as I see it, the update is happening in the root of the repo, rather than the folder containing the file, so I'm not actually updating the files I want to. Is there any way to keep a safe, working copy of a folder? Is it possible to force git to update a folder rather than the root of a repo?
```
