A: This is a common technique called /etc/shells and it is frequently used to prevent someone from changing their shell to something that is deemed a security risk. If you have a bash shell set to run chsh and a default /bin/bash shell is set to /bin/sh, that means someone could easily change a directory in your home directory and have themselves set to /bin/bash. A more detailed explanation can be found here: To summarize, you want to search /etc/shells to ensure the current shell is allowed. Look for: bash or sh and delete the line, possibly with a comment below it to explain what it was there for: /etc/shells: #! /bin/bash # Added by update-alternatives --install /bin/sh shell /etc/shells: #! /bin/sh # Added by update-alternatives --install /bin/sh shell If this is your only shell configured, then you've probably got a shell without the #!. Run this script to fix it: $ cat /etc/shells #! /bin/bash # Added by update-alternatives --install /bin/sh shell Log out and log back in. Should work. Q: Set search pattern for Spring's ContentNegotiatingViewResolver Does someone knows how to set the search pattern for spring's contentNegotiatingViewResolver? I'm using annotation based configuration for my Spring web application.
