The data in the database is set to expire on a monthly basis. I need to make sure they are only shown for the last 30 days. is there a way to do this in the SQL database or in the C# code after i receive the date from the database? A: I need to make sure they are only shown for the last 30 days. This sounds like you will want to do this check in your front-end code, on each call to your web service. You could write a class with a public static property which will give you a DateTime object representing the current date-time and another property that will subtract one month from it, and then check if the time component is within 30 days of midnight (0). That's the simplest way of doing it but not necessarily the best or most efficient. A: In general, Date values in SQL are not guaranteed to be accurate to within a single minute, so you

I just purchased a brand new home and noticed a brownish stain on my aluminum siding. Is it actually just dirt? If so, why does it appear to be really heavy and sticky? If not dirt, what could it be? How can I get rid of it? A: If you think it's a light, brownish stain, you can use dish detergent. Mix in 1 part dish detergent to 10 parts water. You may have to use a small brush or your finger. This is a fix that works very well for some stains on painted surfaces, but it's hard to get it off of aluminum and probably not going to work well on aluminum siding. I'd start with a different technique first.

OverviewTags.Re: [Apache-devel] Re: BDB Buffer Pool From: Victor Baars Subject: Re: [Apache-devel] Re: BDB Buffer Pool Date: Tue, 25 Oct 2001 14:05:35 +0200 The thing to remember about BDB is that as a client library it is far from mature. It handles I/O errors in a very procedural manner, like for example a first time read attempt on a DB creates a new backend DB connection and then removes the old one. This might not be what you expect if the same connection is shared with multiple request threads or simply shared by mistake when there wasn't an aborted transaction in place. So if we are talking about a few hundred thousand clients where the buffer overrun occurs rarely we still end up with many changes in the database. The obvious solution to this would be to add a mechanism to the client libraries that can be used for error recovery and simply ignore the error. To my knowledge this hasn't been done so it remains to be seen if this is possible. I've noticed a similar problem in the Apache FOP code (FOP does the same thing in a procedural manner and ignores problems). I still see the advantage of having the buffer pool implemented using a separate process and communicating with the client over a connection pool. This would cut down on the number of backend database connections to a minimum and the pool can be tuned to allow only the necessary connections. Also the size of the buffer pool would be smaller and easier to manage as changing the size of it only requires the change in a shared library. Hope this helps, Victor Baars, VBAARS@...They lived with the man that was their lover for almost a year before they decided to end it.
