In addition to its excellent antibacterial activity, penicillin itself or its derivatives, such as ampicillin, are also known to have a suppressing effect on the inflammation caused by infection. The synthesis of various penicillins is known. In the penicillin G amidase method, a sulfoxide protective group is added to the β -lactam ring, and, in the semi-synthesis of ampicillin, a 5-amino group is protected with a carbamoyl group, and the carbamoyl group is converted to a tertiary amine. Benzylpenicillin is a non-enzyme penicillin that is obtained by a simple amidation between benzyl chloride and penicillin G, and clinical studies have been conducted over the last decades on this benzylpenicillin. However, this benzylpenicillin has been found to have the adverse effect of high therapeutic dose dependence and long half life due to a metabolic route, and has thus not been used commonly. Since ampicillin hydrochloride has a lower therapeutic dose dependence than benzylpenicillin, it is now widely used clinically. It has been reported that, upon oral administration, ampicillin hydrochloride is subjected to a partial enzymatic hydrolysis by the colon microflora to produce benzylpenicillin, which is the effective component. Further, some benzylpenicillin has been reported to be present in ampicillin hydrochloride. Various types of ampicillin derivatives have been developed in order to solve the toxicity of ampicillin and to increase the antibacterial activity of the derivatives. WO2006/036466A1 proposes using an aminopiperidylcarboxylic acid derivative having at least one piperidylcarboxylic acid unit and an aminobenzyl group as an antibacterial agent.V 1cdb36666d
