The field of pancreatic cancer treatment includes both surgery and nonsurgical options. With nonsurgical options, chemotherapy and radiotherapy remain the mainstays for palliation. Inoperable pancreatic cancer, extrapancreatic extension, and local malignant extension are indications for systemic treatment. In these patients, both chemotherapy and radiation are used. Chemotherapy can be administered alone or in conjunction with radiation. Some chemotherapeutic agents have an effect on pancreatic cancer that is independent of the conventional cytotoxic effects, thus improving overall survival. There are a variety of regimens for radiation therapy. Most of the current pancreatic cancer trials employ radiation doses of greater than 45 Gy.
