On windows, there are software that can image USB storage mediums and turn the image into a backup image. I'm not currently aware of free alternatives for Linux or Mac. A: Backupy is a free, open source backup utility with minimal dependencies. It uses rsync as the underlying backend mechanism. Backupy comes with two modes: the first performs a basic backup (only files that have changed from last backup); the second one performs a backup of your whole disk (included some spare space on the disk). Backupy is available as a Windows installer and as a portable app (to simplify, you just have to download the ZIP archive with Backupy and everything works automatically). Installation Download and install the zip archive from here. In your software management tool (or shell, if you prefer) extract the archive by double clicking it (do not run it with the cmd.exe shell), and then run the Backupy.exe executable. Backupy will then ask you to choose the installation path (default location will be C:\Users\USER_NAME\Downloads\Backupy), where it will save the files as well as a backup folder. If you then want to add another drive, you have to enter its path in the Files and folders section. A full backup is done using the following options: -b -b ::::::: Basic backup: backup : ::::: Extract options: extract : ::::: Use options: use : ::::: Reverse options: r: ::::: Extract speeds: : ::::: Extract options: extract -d: ::::: Use options:
