Full Text. Kerin, R. A. (1998). MarketingÂ . Diversity is essential, but moreover, this cultural model that we are clearly, and that is, the root of a multicultural market and Marketing 11th Edition in PDF. Polymeric materials are in widespread use for a variety of applications, including, for example, food, pharmaceutical, and cosmetic packaging. Polymeric materials are generally chosen for a given application based on their ability to perform necessary functions, including, for example, the strength or toughness required for a particular application. However, some polymeric materials have properties that limit their usefulness in certain applications. For instance, many polymeric materials are incapable of functioning as a package for highly volatile materials, such as, for example, volatile fragrances. In addition, when polymeric materials are exposed to high levels of heat, as, for example, in a microwave oven, they may melt or thermally degrade in ways that can deleteriously affect the properties of the materials. Furthermore, many polymeric materials may be potentially hazardous or toxic, or may produce flammable or explosive byproducts, which are undesirable in many applications. To render certain polymeric materials suitable for use as a package for volatile materials, certain polymeric materials have been formulated with a gas barrier additive, such as a paraffin, fatty acid, wax, or the like. These additives prevent the penetration of, for example, oxygen or water vapor into the package through the walls of the polymeric material. However, these additives may also be present in the volatile material, and the formation of such a polymeric package may not be desirable where the gas barrier properties of the additive are deleterious. Furthermore, such packages may be unsuitable for use where a high level of gas permeability is desired. This is particularly true in the case of microwave-safe packages 1cdb36666d
