Q: Sinon stub for an appended element? I'm currently working on extracting all the asynchronous calls in our code. So far, our code contains a lot of mutations, so I'm finding it quite difficult to test every mutation. I know I can stub the mutation (e.g. `$('#body').append(...)`), but I do not know how to stub the returned `$http` response. I could set the mocked request in the code to return a certain response, but for certain routes, this is impossible because the returned data is just appended. Simplified example `function myFunction(a, b, c) { return $http.post("/some/endpoint", a, b, c).then(function success(response) { return response.data; }, function error(response) { throw response; }); } function foo() { $http.get("/some/endpoint").then(myFunction); }` What I'm trying to do Given this simple example, what would be the best way to stub the mocked response?

A: Sinon is for stubbing functions, not mocking types. To mock requests with Sinon, you can use it with third-party libraries like Axios. With Axios, you can mock requests using mocks and stubs. Once you do that, you can start testing your code. You're finding problems is because you're mixing stubs with mocks, which is against their names and when you get into that kind of situation, it's very difficult to solve it and test it properly. The best way would be
