Effects of alcohol and cannabis on motor skills of novice and experienced drivers. Drugs such as alcohol and cannabis may influence motor skills, which have important implications for driver licensing and driving standards. This study examines the combined effect of alcohol and cannabis on motor skills of novice and experienced drivers. To examine the effects of alcohol, cannabis, their co-use, and driving experience on motor skills including tracking, lane-keeping, steering, and reaction time. Thirty experienced drivers and 30 novice drivers aged 25-50, completed a driving simulator and were tested on a series of driving tasks whilst sober or under the influence of alcohol and/or cannabis. Results demonstrate that co-use of alcohol and cannabis, and vehicle type (rental car or 4WD) influence the reaction time on the simulated driving task. The co-use of alcohol and cannabis decreased performance on the simulator task. These results suggest that novice drivers need to consider the effects of alcohol and cannabis on their abilities to perform a number of driving tasks. Furthermore, driving tests that rely on skilled motor skills may underestimate impairments in simulated driving performance. This study highlights the need to develop and enforce licensing and driving standards that address the effects of alcohol and cannabis.type="ref") The aim of hypofractionated treatments might be to safely deliver the full intended dose to a tumour with a reduced number of treatment fractions. However, owing to the limited spatial resolution of imaging methods, this approach can lead to inaccurate dose painting and, therefore, underdosing of the target volume. An overview of the studies presented in this meta-analysis has been published previously.9{ref-type="ref") The present study included a subset of these studies, and the statistical analyses were performed on a larger data set. The previous analysis focused on FFS, while the present analysis focused on LFS. Despite the increased number of patients, this study was not designed to compare FFS and LFS. Additionally, the limited number of studies and events in the previous meta-analysis precluded the use of a random-effects model. The current findings indicate that a higher number of patients with LFS results in significantly fewer lung-only and pulmonary metastasis recurrences. Thus, a potential explanation could be that patients with LFS were not included in FFS studies, in which the large majority of patients had cN2 disease, which is known to have a high risk of lung-only relapse. Additionally, the
