There are a wide variety of applications in the chemical, pharmaceutical, petroleum, and pulp and paper industries, among others, which involve the contact of an aqueous liquid with a hydrocarbon-containing gas to remove hydrocarbons from the gas. For example, an increasing number of industrial and other processes use hydrocarbon-containing gaseous effluents, such as gaseous effluents of the Kraft process and the gasification of coal, among other uses. It is common practice to employ aqueous scrubbing solutions containing aqueous liquid, such as water, or aqueous solutions of surfactants, alkali metal salts, or various other agents to reduce the contaminants, such as CO.sub.2, NO.sub.x, H.sub.2 S, VOCs, and halides, from the gas. A wide variety of processes are known for removing dissolved and suspended contaminants from an aqueous solution. These processes include the use of scrubbers, filters, reverse osmosis, and other such processes. These processes typically require the removal of the contaminants from the aqueous solution. Also, they usually require the provision of a source of clean water for replenishment. Another common f988f36e3a
